

I reside in Southeastern Indiana, but receive my local channels from the Cincinnati market. The local cable companies carry both the Indianapolis and Cincinnati markets. It would seem to me that it would be important for a local channel market to be in the same state for two reasons. 1) During times of severe weather the Cincinnati market is east of our location, so they are delayed in delivering timely weather updates. 2) Since we are in a different state, it is only natural that the Cincinnati stations won't cover Indiana government affairs. It would seem that this lack of coverage would be a right to information issue. I believe it is essential for rural satellite viewers to be supplied with the same information that cable viewers already receive. Thanks for your consideration.
